

Major media and broadcasters have always had a dim view of the American individual's rights to fair use, and continue to try and eliminate it. Forcing inclusion of copy protection devices or technology in consumer devices, and consequently forcing the consumer to pay for these devices, which reduce their ability to exercise fair use in favor of corporate 'rights' is inappropriate. For the commission to place itself in direct opposition to the individual right to fair use is distressing.